IN REMOVAL PROCEEDINGS

APPEAL

ON BEHALF OF RESPONDENT: Timothy E. Wichmer, Esquire

ON BEHALF OF DHS: Glenda M. Raborn
Assistant Chief Counsel

APPLICATION: Remand for adjustment of status

This case comes before this Board pursuant to a remand order from the United States Court of Appeals for the (b) (6) Circuit. The Court remanded the record for this Board to resolve apparent inconsistent decisions. The record will be remanded to the Immigration Judge for further proceedings.

As the Court observed, this case has a "tortured procedural history." See (b) (6)
(b) (6) The facts of the case are as follows. The respondent, a native and citizen of Nigeria, applied for, and was granted, a student (F-1) visa to enter the United States in 1995. Thereafter, he married a United States citizen named (b) (6) who filed a visa petition on his behalf in 1998. That petition was denied by the Immigration and Naturalization Service (now the United States Citizenship and Immigration Services ("USCIS")), a component of the Department of Homeland Security). The respondent's application for adjustment of status based upon the marriage was denied on May 24, 2001, upon a finding that the respondent (the beneficiary of the visa petition) had entered into the marriage solely for the purpose of obtaining an immigration benefit.¹ The respondent was served a Notice to Appear and placed in removal proceedings.

¹ We note that while an Immigration Judge may deny a continuance (as in this case) based upon the denial of a visa petition based on the statutory bar contained in section 204(c) of the Act or deny an application for adjustment of status based upon a prior fraudulent marriage, the denial of a visa petition pursuant to section 204(c) is statutory.

(b) (6)

During this period, the respondent and his first wife divorced and the respondent remarried. His second wife, (b) (6) a United States citizen, filed a visa petition on his behalf. The visa petition filed on behalf of the respondent by his second wife was denied on April 8, 2002. (b) (6) filed a second visa petition on the respondent's behalf in 2005. That petition was approved on March 8, 2006. Based upon the approval of the visa petition, the respondent filed a motion to remand proceedings so he could pursue an application for adjustment of status. Upon discovery that the second visa petition filed by (b) (6) had been approved, the DHS filed a Notice of Intent to Revoke approval of the visa petition on August 22, 2006. Although the record contains the Notice of Intent to Revoke the petition, the record does not reveal that the petition was actually revoked.

At removal proceedings that were commenced following the denial of the respondent's application for adjustment of status before the INS in 2001, the Immigration Judge concluded in a decision dated June 25, 2002, that the INS had failed to prove by clear and convincing evidence that the respondent's 1995 admission (on a student visa) was based upon visa fraud. I.J. at 2. However, the Immigration Judge did conclude that the respondent's application for adjustment of status could not be granted because the visa petition filed on his behalf by his second wife was subject to the statutory bar against the approval of a visa petition after a previous visa petition has been denied based upon a finding that the previous marriage was fraudulent. See section 204(c) of the Immigration and Nationality Act; 8 U.S.C. § 1182(c). I.J. at 3.

Although the record contains a Notice of Intent to Revoke the second visa petition filed by (b) (6) and approved on March 8, 2006, the record does not contain evidence that the approval of that petition was actually revoked. If the petition was actually revoked, such evidence may be submitted on remand to the Immigration Judge. Assuming arguendo that such a revocation was effected, the respondent's application for adjustment of status must be denied for lack of an immediately available visa petition. See, e.g., Matter Velarde 23 I&N Dec.253 (2002) (application for relief must establish statutory eligibility). However, if the approval of the visa petition was not revoked, the Immigration Judge may consider continuing the case to see if USCIS ultimately revokes the petition or hold a hearing to see if DHS presents sufficient evidence of prior marriage fraud to warrant a denial of the application for adjustment of status as a matter of discretion.²

² The record indicates that the Immigration Judge denied the respondent's request for a continuance in 2002, because a previously filed visa petition was denied by the INS on 204(c) grounds. Subsequent to that decision, that visa petition was denied. Therefore, the Immigration Judge never made a finding that 204(c) statutorily barred the respondent from seeking adjustment of status as he denied the continuance pursuant to this Board's decision in Matter Velarde, 23 I&N Dec. 253 (2002). Because the record does not contain clear evidence that the second visa petition filed by (b) (6) on behalf of the respondent was actually revoked, we are unwilling to conclude that the 204(c) bar would prevent the respondent from seeking adjustment of status if the USCIS had in fact approved a subsequent visa petition on his behalf.

(b) (6)

Accordingly, we will remand the record for further proceedings.

ORDER: The record is remanded to the Immigration Judge for further proceedings.
